One man is lame therefore all his neighbors must wear crutches. This is practically the argument the prohibition people make in regard to the liquor question. Because two or three men use liquor to excess prohibition would compel a hundred temperate men to follow the rule of total abstinence. The fox that lost his tail and tried to induce his fellows to discard theirs was much more fair-minded than this. He, at least, used persuasion rather than force, for he argued that it was much more comfortable to be without a tail than with one.

That there is much good in beer all thinking people must admit. The food value of the barley malt is certain; so are the tonic properties of hops; and all authorities agree that the small amount of alcohol found in beer—less than 3 per cent in PRIMO BEER—is mildly stimulating and beneficial.

If all good people will drink beer they will longer retain the bloom of youth upon their cheeks and preserve their bodily vigor.
